

On 29 September the European Parliament will once again celebrate Multilingualism Day, a chance for citizens to peek behind the curtain and see what it takes to work in 24 languages. Take a look at the Multilingualism Day webpage to see what is going on.

<http://www.europarl.europa.eu/visiting/en/brussels/multilingualism-day-2018>

Multilingualism is hardwired into the European Parliament with a democratic duty to ensure that debates, documents and daily business are understood by all citizens of the EU. Achieving this requires the determined work of the European Parliament's translators and interpreters.

Visitors at Multilingualism Day will have the chance to try your tongue at interpretation, try your hand at translation and learn how debates take place in the Hemicycle, as well as much more. They can put questions to translators and interpreters, and find out how to make their language into their career. The House of European History will also host special guided tours of their permanent exhibition focused on language diversity throughout history.